List entry Description

Summary of Monument

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Reasons for Designation

Bowl barrows, the most numerous form of round barrow, are funerary monuments dating from the Late Neolithic period to the Late Bronze Age, with most examples belonging to the period 2400-1500 BC. They were constructed as earthen or rubble mounds, sometimes ditched, which covered single or multiple burials. They occur either in isolation or grouped as cemeteries and often acted as a focus for burials in later periods. Often superficially similar, although differing widely in size, they exhibit regional variations in form and a diversity of burial practices. There are over 10,000 surviving bowl barrows recorded nationally (many more have already been destroyed), occurring across most of lowland Britain. Often occupying prominent locations, they are a major historic element in the modern landscape and their considerable variation of form and longevity as a monument type provide important information on the diversity of beliefs and social organisations amongst early prehistoric communities. They are particularly representative of their period and a substantial proportion of surviving examples are considered worthy of protection.

Although the barrow 155m east of Sheep Drift Farm has suffered some damage caused by falling trees, the disturbance is superficial and the monument survives well. Evidence of the manner in which the barrow was constructed and used, of the duration of its use and of the local environment at the time of and prior to its construction will be preserved in the mound and in the soils buried beneath it. The importance of this monument is enhanced by the fact that it is situated close to another barrow which lies 30m to the north-east, and that both are among the several which remain of a large group of barrows recorded in the area.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes a bowl barrow which is visible as a mound standing to a maximum height of 2m and covering an area 20m in diameter. Although there is no trace on the ground surface of a ditch encircling the mound, it is probable that such a ditch exists as a buried feature.

They are particularly representative of their period and a substantial proportion of surviving examples are considered worthy of protection.

Records of the barrow ENE of Sheep Drift Farm, made before the greater part of the mound was hidden by a cover of additional topsoil, indicate that it was subjected to a limited excavation at some unknown date in the past but that the extent of this disturbance was minor. Evidence of the manner in which the barrow was constructed and used, of the duration of its use and of the local environment at and prior to that time will be preserved in the mound, in the soils buried beneath the mound, and in deposits in the buried ditch. The importance of this monument is enhanced by the fact that it is situated close to another barrow which lies 30m to the south-east, and that both are among the several which remain of a large group recorded in the area.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes a bowl barrow which consists of an earthen mound encircled by a ditch. The mound covers an area c 19m in diameter and was recorded in 1977 as standing to a height of 0.5m. Since then it has been raised to c 1.8m by the dumping of topsoil and organic matter over the central area and converted into a garden feature. The original earthwork has a maximum height of c 0.4m where it projects beyond this cover on the southern and eastern sides, and it is also visible as a slight hump, c 0.25m in height, beneath the concrete surface of a track which crosses it on the northern side. The ditch, from which earth was dug and used during construction of the barrow, has become filled-in and, although visible at one time as a slight depression in the ground surface, it now exists only as a buried feature. Excluded from the scheduling are a fence which runs across the mound from east to west and the concrete surface of the track which crosses it on the northern side, although the ground beneath these features is included.

They are particularly representative of their period and a substantial proportion of surviving examples are considered worthy of protection.

Evaluation has shown that the barrow 450m north west of Sheep Drift Farm retains important archaeological information, despite the construction on it of a pill box and associated military trenches and the removal of material from the west, north and eastern sides of the mound. Evidence of the construction of the barrow, of the manner and duration of its use, and of the environment, at and prior to the time of its construction, will be contained in the mound and in the soils preserved beneath it. The barrow is one of a large group recorded on and around Martlesham Heath, including five within a radius of 600m, and together these will provide evidence of the nature and extent of Bronze Age activities in the area. The pill box is well-preserved and of importance as an example of military works constructed in the area during World War II. The use of a prehistoric barrow for this purpose is also of interest.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes a bowl barrow and a superimposed World War II pill box with associated trenches. It is situated immediately to the south east of what was formerly Martlesham Heath Airfield. The barrow is visible as an earthen mound which survives to a maximum height of 1.7m. The mound is now incomplete, but is known originally to have covered an area approximately 17m in diameter. On it is a hexagonal pill box, constructed of brick and concrete and occupying an area of approximately 10 square metres, and around this are the remains of a gun emplacement and slit trenches with brick retaining walls. A survey and limited excavation were carried out on the site in July 1991, in order to ascertain the extent of surviving archaeological deposits in the barrow. This showed that the mound survives to a height of approximately 0.9m beneath the floor of the pill box and that, even in areas which have been substantially levelled, parts of the base of the mound and underlying soils remain intact. One sherd of Bronze Age pottery was found in the yellow sand of which the mound is composed.

They are particularly representative of their period and a substantial proportion of surviving examples are considered worthy of protection.

Although the bowl barrow at Birch Grove, Martlesham Heath has been buried and partly reduced, the greater part of the mound remains in the condition recorded prior to 1989 and the surrounding ditch survives as a buried feature. These records confirm that the monument survives well. Evidence concerning the construction of the barrow and the manner and duration of its use, as well as the local environment at that time, will be contained in the mound, in the soils preserved beneath it, and in the fill of the buried ditch. The monument is one of a large group of barrows recorded on and around Martlesham Heath, including three which survive as visible monuments within a distance of 425m to south and east.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes a small bowl barrow situated in a private garden on what was once wooded heathland and formerly visible as an earthen mound encircled by a ditch. Since 1989 the barrow has been obscured as a result of the dumping of soil on and around it, so as to raise the level of the surrounding surface, and of the removal of approximately 0.15m of material from the top of the mound. The mound is recorded as covering an area 8.5m in diameter and as having stood to a height of between 0.5m and 0.8m, with a slight hollow in the surface which marked the site of an old excavation. The ditch, from which material was dug and used in the construction of the mound, had become largely infilled, but was visible as a slight depression in the ground surface on the south east side of the mound.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes a bowl barrow situated on the southern edge of a modern housing development on what was formerly heathland. The barrow is visible as an earthen mound which is encircled by a buried ditch. The mound covers a circular area with a diameter of 24m and was recorded in 1982 as standing to a maximum height of 1.08m. Over the top and the north side of the barrow, this has been increased to between 1.2m and 1.25m by the addition of a layer of topsoil approximately 0.15m thick. The barrow is crossed east-west by a field boundary and the southern part of the mound has been spread by ploughing and reduced to a maximum height of approximately 0.4m. The surrounding ditch, from which earth was dug and used during construction of the mound, was at one time marked by a slight depression in the ground surface. It has now become completely filled, but survives as a buried feature approximately 3m wide. The post and rail fence which crosses the monument is excluded from the scheduling although the ground beneath is included.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes a bowl barrow, situated on former heathland, 1800m west of the Deben estuary. The barrow is visible as a low mound, marked also by a light coloured, sandy patch in the ploughsoil, and the mound is encircled by a buried ditch. The mound was originally approximately 14m in diameter, but has been spread by ploughing to a diameter of approximately 25m and reduced to a height of approximately 0.25m. The surrounding ditch, from which earth was dug and used during construction of the barrow, has become filled in, but evidence that it exists as a buried feature beneath the ploughsoil has been recorded by means of aerial photography.

BRIGHTWELL Church of St. John the Baptist

16.3.66

II* Church, medieval, with alterations of c.1656 for Thomas Essington of Brightwell Hall, and further restoration C19. Nave, chancel, west tower and south porch. Medieval work of plastered flint rubble with limestone dressings; C17 work in red brick, perhaps once plastered. Mid C19 porch of gault brick with parapet gables. Plaintiled roofs; the tower roof flat behind parapets.

Several windows of c.1300, some with Y-tracery (some blocked for monuments); the east window of 3 lights with intersecting tracery. Early C14 south doorway with original boarded door and sanctuary knocker. The tower of c.1656 was placed upon existing walls at west end of nave, the east face supported on giant Tuscan columns. Parapets have obelisk corner pinnacles, clasping buttresses and arched recessed belfry openings. Similar obelisk pinnacles placed at apex of east gable and at base of east and west end gables. Fine mid C14 font of limestone, with octagonal bowl having traceried facets, and moulded stem and base; painted cover of c.1656. Octagonal oak-panelled mid C17 pulpit. Fine marble wall tablets to Thomas Essington (d.1651), his sister Anna (d.1660), and to Arthur Barnardiston (d.1734). A marble C18 floor slab inscribed "The Barnardistons Vault"; another to Thomas Essington,snr. (d.1656) and his daughter Anna (d.1660). 4 painted C18 escutcheons of the Barnardiston family on the nave wall.

Summary of Monument

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Reasons for Designation

Bowl barrows, the most numerous form of round barrow, are funerary monuments dating from the Late Neolithic period to the Late Bronze Age, with most examples belonging to the period 2400-1500 BC. They were constructed as earthen or rubble mounds, sometimes ditched, which covered single or multiple burials. They occur either in isolation or grouped as cemeteries and often acted as a focus for burials in later periods. Often superficially similar, although differing widely in size, they exhibit regional variations in form and a diversity of burial practices. There are over 10,000 surviving bowl barrows recorded nationally (many more have already been destroyed), occurring across most of lowland Britain. Often occupying prominent locations, they are a major historic element in the modern landscape and their considerable variation of form and longevity as a monument type provide important information on the diversity of beliefs and social organisations amongst early prehistoric communities. They are particularly representative of their period and a substantial proportion of surviving examples are considered worthy of protection.

Although a wartime trench has been dug into Pole Hill bowl barrow, the greater part of the monument survives well and will retain important archaeological information. Evidence concerning the construction of the barrow, the manner and duration of its use, and also the local environment, at and prior to the time of its construction, will be contained in the mound and in the soils preserved beneath it. The barrow is one of a large group recorded in the parishes of Martlesham, Brightwell and Foxhall, including a small cemetery consisting of six barrows of varied type which lay between 300m and 500m to the north east and which were excavated in 1953. Together, these will provide evidence of the nature and extent of Bronze Age activities in the area.

List entry Description

Summary of Monument

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Reasons for Designation

Bowl barrows, the most numerous form of round barrow, are funerary monuments dating from the Late Neolithic period to the Late Bronze Age, with most examples belonging to the period 2400-1500 BC. They were constructed as earthen or rubble mounds, sometimes ditched, which covered single or multiple burials. They occur either in isolation or grouped as cemeteries and often acted as a focus for burials in later periods. Often superficially similar, although differing widely in size, they exhibit regional variations in form and a diversity of burial practices. There are over 10,000 surviving bowl barrows recorded nationally (many more have already been destroyed), occurring across most of lowland Britain. Often occupying prominent locations, they are a major historic element in the modern landscape and their considerable variation of form and longevity as a monument type provide important information on the diversity of beliefs and social organisations amongst early prehistoric communities. They are particularly representative of their period and a substantial proportion of surviving examples are considered worthy of protection.

The two bowl barrows 312m south west of Dobbs Corner survive relatively well; although a trench has been dug into one of the mounds, the scale of this disturbance is limited in relation to the earthwork as a whole. Evidence concerning the construction of the barrows, the relationship between them and the manner and duration of their use, as well as of the local environment, at the time of and prior to their construction, will be contained in the mounds and in the soils preserved beneath them. The two barrows are situated within what was once a small cemetery, including four others which are documented as a result of excavation. The cemetery, in turn, formed part of a much larger group of barrows, others of which survive as visible monuments in the parishes of Brightwell, Foxhall and Martlesham and Waldringfield; together these will provide evidence of the nature and extent of Bronze Age activities in the area.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes two contiguous bowl barrows, situated in a belt of wooded heathland to the west of Dobbs Lane. Each of the barrows is visible as an earthen mound covering an area c.12m in diameter. The mounds stand to heights of 1m and 0.8m respectively and the combined length of the two along a north east - south west axis is approximately 24m. A poorly defined hollow in the surface of the north eastern mound marks the site of a trench approximately 1.5m wide, dug since 1921 when the earliest description of the barrow was published. The barrows are the only two which survive of a closely spaced group of six, the other four of which were excavated in 1919. One of those four, a mound approximately 6m in diameter, contained an Anglo-Saxon cremation burial but the other three were of Bronze Age date.

They are particularly representative of their period and a substantial proportion of surviving examples are considered worthy of protection.

The greater part of the western of the two bowl barrows in Spratt's Plantation survives well. Investigation of the wartime trench dug into the mound has demonstrated that the scale of this disturbance is small in relation to the monument as a whole and has not affected the base of the mound or the surface beneath it. Approximately half of the eastern mound also survives, with the whole of the encircling ditch. Evidence of the construction of the barrows and of the manner and duration of their use, as well as of the local environment at that time, will be contained in the mounds, in the soils preserved beneath them, and in the fill of the surrounding ditches. The two barrows originally formed part of a cluster of four and are within a much larger group of barrows, others of which survive as visible monuments on and around Martlesham Heath; together these will provide evidence of the nature and extent of Bronze Age activities in the area.

History

Legacy Record - This information may be included in the List Entry Details.

Details

The monument includes two bowl barrows situated in the south eastern corner of a plantation on the east side of Martlesham Heath. The barrows are approximately 33m apart in an east-west alignment and each is visible as an earthen mound encircled by a ditch. The mound of the eastern barrow stands to a maximum height of 1.84m and covers a circular area approximately 25m in diameter. On its surface is a slight, linear hollow, marking the site of a trench dug from the western side towards the centre during World War II. A limited excavation, carried out in 1974, established that this trench was not deep enough to have penetrated the base of the mound or the surface which underlies it. The mound itself was not investigated but three sherds of pottery were found, including one of prehistoric type. The surrounding ditch, from which earth was dug and used during construction of the mound, has become largely filled but it is still visible on the western side of the mound as a slight depression in the ground surface, approximately 3m wide and 0.1m deep. The mound of the western barrow stands to a maximum height of 1.4m and covers a circular area approximately 19m in diameter. Parts of the southern and western sides have been dug away, leaving an irregular profile in all except the north eastern quadrant. The surrounding ditch is visible on the eastern side of the mound as a slight hollow in the ground surface, approximately 3m wide and 0.15m deep. Excavation of the sites of two adjacent barrows, which no longer survive as visible monuments, discovered
